The Society of Legal Scholars is one of the world's leading academic societies for legal scholars. It was founded in 1908 by a group of leading legal scholars who wanted to create a forum for the discussion of legal scholarship. The Society has since grown to over 1,000 members, and its members have included some of the most influential legal scholars of the past century.

The Society's patrons have played a vital role in its development. They have provided financial support, intellectual leadership, and mentorship to generations of legal scholars. The book Bringing Law to Life: Patrons of the Society tells the stories of these patrons and their contributions to the Society.

The book is divided into three parts. The first part provides a history of the Society and its patrons. The second part contains biographical sketches of some of the most influential patrons. The third part explores the impact of patrons on the Society and the legal profession.
