McCourt first met Conroy in 1976, when they were both living in New York City. They quickly bonded over their shared love of writing and their Irish heritage. Over the years, they became close friends, sharing laughter, tears, and countless stories.

In Pat Conroy: Our Lifelong Friendship, McCourt recounts some of his favorite memories of Conroy. He writes about their adventures in Ireland, their fishing trips, and their late-night conversations. He also shares some of the challenges they faced, including Conroy's struggles with alcoholism and depression.

Throughout the book, McCourt's love and admiration for Conroy is evident. He writes about Conroy's generosity, his wit, and his passion for life. He also pays tribute to Conroy's writing, which he says "changed the way we think about the South, about family, and about ourselves."

Pat Conroy: Our Lifelong Friendship is a beautiful and heartbreaking memoir about a friendship that lasted a lifetime. It is a must-read for fans of Conroy's work and for anyone who has ever experienced the loss of a loved one.
